From Goodland County, I noticed in yesterday's Times-Dispatch your advice to some one about using a phosphate on clover cut the second time. I have a very nice lot near my house, on which I sowed clover and wheat last fall and cut them this spring for hay, the clover being about half as high as the wheat. Since then a very fine second growth has been made. I will cut this now for feed. What time would you sow the seed?

stubble, and sowed clover again among the corn at last. The clover was in late August. This ensilage crop was in ways late, of course, since the clover was planted after the clover was cut. But I think that you can get a good stand of clover sown in September, and your peas should be ready to cut in August. I would apply a good dressing of Thomas phosphate on the pea stubble this, on account of the lime it carries, and disk it in well, and sow the clover seed. Five or fifteen pounds an acre will do, and it profitable to have the plenty of clover seed. On strong land you will be able to cut the clover next spring.

The affair has caused a great sensation here, and will probably bring about a ministerial crisis.

She struck one and her clothing caught fire. The mother found her enveloped in flames, and extinguished them by the use of blankets, but she was too late. The little girl having been fatally burned.
